2016 Australian Community Survey by NCLS Research. A survey of a representative sample of Australians via an online research panel (n = 1,258).
Nearly six in ten of all Australians believe in God or a higher power

Believers: In 2016, 59% of Australians said they believed in a personal God (24%), or some sort of spirit or life force (35%).

Agnostic: Nearly one in five (19%) said ‘I don't really know what to think’.

Atheistic: One in five (21%) Australians said ‘I don't really think there is any sort of spirit, God or life force”

Over a quarter of Australians (28%) report having had a mystical or supernatural experience.

A further third either know someone who has had this type of experience or believe it could happen.

Three in ten Australians say they pray or meditate at least once a week.

Private religious or spiritual practices are a part of the week for a significant minority of Australians.

Less than one in five Australians attend religious services at least monthly.

Church attendance rates have been declining for decades. In late 2016 around 18% reported that they attended religious services at least monthly. Some 47% say they never attend.

Around four in ten Australians (39%) agreed that religion is good for Australian society.

A similar proportion (40%) were neutral or unsure.

Two in ten (21%) disagreed.

With the long-term co-operation of most Australian Christian denominations, NCLS Research can provide an overview of the Australian churches landscape.

NB. It is only ever possible to provide estimates. Some churches are under-represented, such as indigenous churches, mono-ethnic churches from non-English speaking backgrounds, and other independent churches.
In 2011 the estimated number of church locations was around 12,400.

Between 1991 to 2011 there was a net decrease of at least 1,000 churches.

It is made up of a decrease in mainstream Protestant church locations partly offset by an increase in Pentecostal and other Protestant locations.

Source: NCLS Research Churches database. NB. To track changes over time, only parish counts (not Mass centres) are included for the Catholic Church, as Mass centre counts are not available back to 1991.
The average size of churches in Australia is 121 people attending in a typical week.

Average size per denomination

Largest: Catholic parishes (360), ACC (115), Baptist (119) and Reformed (141).

Smallest: Anglican (55), Presbyterian (50), and Uniting (51) – reflecting their presence in many small rural towns.

Decreasing levels of self-reported attendance at religious services have been tracked through sample surveys of the Australian population over several generations.

The decline has continued since 1990, but at a slowing rate.
In 2011 the estimated weekly church attendance was 1,432,000 (or 6% of the Australian population).

Based on current best estimates, overall church attendance declined by around 13% over 20 years from 1991 to 2011.

NB: Self-reported attendance rates obtained from sample surveys tend to be inflated compared to head counts and estimates from church leaders and administrators.
A selection of research findings from the 2016 ACS and the 2011 NCLS will be available in the NCLS Research magazine
